8-8 MONDAY THRU SATURDAY | SUNDAYS & HOLIDAYS 9-6

Called up one of my girlfriends today and we ended up talking for almost two hours. 😊 You know how that goes.

We covered everything – grandkids, great-grandkids, life, business, all of it. I swear those conversations are better than therapy. 😊

I told her about the jewelry I've been working on and she told me about what's going on in her world, and somewhere in the middle of all that catching up I remembered why I love having women in my life who have known me long enough to just get it and I need more of those women.

My husband was in the garage the whole time turning a wood bowl on his lathe, completely in his element. 😊 Meanwhile I'm on the phone solving the world's problems one conversation at a time. Life is good. Messy and full and good. ❤️

Troy, Montana: A Town Carved from the Wilderness

Where the Kootenai River Runs and the Mountains Remember

There is a place in the far northwest corner of Montana where the Kootenai River bends through a valley so green it almost doesn't look real. Flanked by the Cabinet Mountains to the east and the vast Kootenai National Forest wrapping around it like a blanket, the town of Troy sits quietly — population just under 1,000 — carrying more history in its bones than most places ten times its size.

This is a town that was built by hard people doing hard work. And it shows.

How It All Began

Long before any settler drove a stake into the ground, the land around what is now Troy belonged to the Kootenai people, a tribe who had lived, hunted, and fished along the river for thousands of years. The Kootenai knew this valley well. The river gave them fish. The forests gave them game. The mountains gave them shelter.

European and American explorers began pushing into the region in the early 1800s, and fur traders followed close behind, drawn by the same rivers and forests the Kootenai had always called home. But it wasn't until the railroad arrived that the area's fate really changed.

The Railroad Changes Everything

The Great Northern Railway pushed through the Kootenai River valley in the early 1890s, and almost overnight, a settlement began to take shape. The railroad needed workers, workers needed supplies, and a town grew up to meet that need. Troy was officially platted in 1892 and named after Troy, New York, though the two places couldn't be more different. Where one is a city of brick and industry on the Hudson River, the other was a rough-cut timber town on the edge of the American wilderness. The railroad put Troy on the map, but it was timber that kept it there.

Timber, Sweat, and Sawdust

For most of the 20th century, logging was the lifeblood of Troy. The forests surrounding the town were thick with western larch, Douglas fir, and ponderosa pine — trees that fed the sawmills and kept families employed for generations. Men worked long days in the woods and came home to a town that revolved around that work. The mills hummed. The trucks rolled. The river carried logs downstream. The timber industry shaped not just the economy of Troy but its culture. There was a toughness to life here, a self-reliance that came from living far from anywhere and making do with what the land provided. People fixed things themselves. They helped their neighbors. They didn't expect much from the outside world because the outside world didn't pay much attention to them. That spirit never really left.

The Kootenai River: Troy's Constant Companion

If the railroad built Troy and timber sustained it, the Kootenai River has always been its soul. The river runs right through the heart of town, wide and cold and impossibly clear in places. It has flooded Troy more than once over the years, reminding residents who is really in charge. But it has also given the town some of its most defining features — fishing that draws anglers from across the region, scenery that stops people in their tracks, and a natural rhythm that shapes daily life in ways that are hard to explain to someone who has never lived next to moving water. The Kootenai Falls, located just a few miles east of town, are among the largest undammed waterfalls in the continental United States. The Kootenai tribe considers the falls sacred, and it is not hard to understand why. Standing at the edge of that roaring water, surrounded by old forest and canyon walls, you feel something that is bigger than yourself. A swinging bridge crosses the river near the falls narrow wooden swaying gently over the gorge and walking it has become.

Lincoln County, Montana keeps its calendar full year-round with events that bring the community together and welcome visitors from across the region. The Nordicfest celebration in Libby honors the area's Scandinavian heritage every September with traditional food, music, and dancing that draws crowds from across the Northwest. The Lincoln County Fair gives local families, 4-H members, and farmers a chance to show their best work every summer. Anglers and outdoor lovers flock to the area for fishing tournaments on the Kootenai River, while hunters fill the woods and mountains come fall. Troy and Libby both host community markets, craft fairs, and holiday events throughout the year that keep neighbors connected and local businesses busy. With the Cabinet Mountains, Kootenai National Forest, and some of the most stunning scenery in Montana as a backdrop, Lincoln County does not need much of an excuse to celebrate. 🏔️🎉
